The New START Treaty is a critical arms control agreement between the United States and Russia that limits the number of deployed strategic nuclear weapons. The negotiations leading to the treaty were complex and challenging, and the role of rapid communications, including social media, was significant.

This book provides a comprehensive analysis of the negotiations leading to the New START Treaty. It examines the role of rapid communications, including social media, in shaping the negotiations and their impact on the overall outcome. The book also provides insights into the challenges and opportunities that rapid communications pose for arms control negotiations in the 21st century.

The book is divided into three parts. The first part provides an overview of the New START Treaty and the negotiations that led to its signing. The second part examines the role of rapid communications in the negotiations, including the use of social media by both the United States and Russia. The third part provides insights into the challenges and opportunities that rapid communications pose for arms control negotiations in the 21st century.

This book is essential reading for anyone interested in arms control, nuclear weapons, or the role of rapid communications in international negotiations. It is also a valuable resource for scholars, policymakers, and practitioners working in the field of conflict resolution.
