The criminalization of migration is the process by which states use criminal law to deter, punish, and control migration. This can take a variety of forms, including the criminalization of irregular entry and exit, the criminalization of smuggling and trafficking, and the criminalization of migrants' rights.

The criminalization of migration is a violation of human rights. It violates the right to freedom of movement, the right to seek asylum, and the right to due process. It also has a number of negative consequences, including the erosion of trust between migrants and the state, the creation of a climate of fear and insecurity, and the diversion of resources away from more pressing needs.

The criminalization of migration is also a threat to global security. It undermines the rule of law, creates instability, and fuels conflict. It also makes it more difficult to address the root causes of migration, such as poverty, inequality, and environmental degradation.
